St. Mary's School

As we continue to celebrate the Christmas season and the great wonder of the Incarnation, we enter a new year with hope and optimism. At this time of year, many of us look at our practices and behaviors to see what we might change to make our lives healthier and more meaningful.

As parents and educators, this is a great time to talk to our children and students about how, as a family of faith, we can do different things- or perhaps do the same things in different ways- to live our faith with greater meaning. For example, you might ask your children to think about how, together, you can pray and offer kindness to others. How can you reach out together to others in need? How can you reorganize your routines so that you come together as a family for meals more regularly? What can you do so that nothing interferes with your being able to go to Church every week as a family?

For you and me, as people who love these children and are committed to guiding them in the way of faith, we might ask ourselves, "How can we help our children form habits of community?" Let us commit ourselves to helping one another do this in the year ahead.
